If there's enough of the key protruding from the lock, needle-nose pliers might do the trick in pulling it out carefully without pushing it further in.

However, if simplicity forsakes you and there isn't enough exposed key to grab onto—or worse yet—the break happened inside completely flush with the lock face then one must resort to specialized tools like extractor sets which consist of thin pieces of metal designed specifically for sliding along beside a stuck key fragment.

These extractors have hooks or barbs on their ends to grip onto grooves or cuts on keys allowing them gently pull them out when turned correctly.
